POST-SOCIALIST WARS AND THE MASCULINIST BACKLASH

NECROPOLITICS, NONPOLITICS, PHILOFICTION

FASCISM, MASCULINIST, NATO, PATRIARCHAT, RUSSIA, SOCIALISM, WAR

But it is different with the Ukrainian war, not the least because Russia is a nuclear power. The Yugoslav wars, remaining of a limited regional outreach in spite of the unfortunate NATO intervention in 1999, did not look as a threat to the rest of Europe or the world. In this sense, they cannot be compared to the threatening and explosive expanse of the Ukrainian war in 2022. But in many of their structural and functional features, they look much alike, especially to the local populations. They both immediately produced nation-building (a quick overnight process), violence at all levels, reciprocal nationalisms (nationalisms are only happy together), identitarianisms, militarisation, and masculinisation. In that respect they are comparable, except for the scale.
